Overview of the 2018 NFL Season Structure

The 2018 NFL season followed a standardized schedule format used by the league to ensure competitive balance and fairness. Each team played a total of 16 regular-season games over 17 weeks, with one bye week incorporated. The schedule included games against division rivals, conference opponents, and teams from the opposing conference based on a rotating system.

For the Colts, the 2018 schedule was determined by their placement in the previous season and the NFL's rotational scheduling formula. This structure meant that the Colts faced a mix of familiar AFC South opponents and teams from other divisions, both within the American Football Conference (AFC) and the National Football Conference (NFC).

Scheduling Formula

The NFL uses a scheduling formula that assigns opponents based on three components:

- Six games against division opponents (each team twice)
- Four games against a division from the same conference on a rotating basis
- Four games against a division from the opposite conference on a rotating basis
- Two games against teams from the remaining two divisions in the same conference, based on the previous year's standings

This formula ensured that the Colts' 2018 schedule included a balanced mix of easy and challenging games, impacting their chances for playoff contention.
