Martin Luther King Jr. was married to Coretta Scott King in 1953, and together they had four children. Their marriage is often portrayed as a partnership dedicated to the civil rights movement, with Coretta playing a significant role in supporting King's activism. Like many couples, their relationship faced challenges and pressures, especially given the intense public scrutiny that King endured.

The question of whether Martin Luther King Jr. cheated on his wife involves understanding the nature of their marriage, the societal expectations of the time, and the strains imposed by his public role. Despite the couple's public image of unity, rumors and reports have suggested the possibility of extramarital relationships, which have been the subject of investigation and debate.

FBI Surveillance and Allegations of Infidelity

The FBI, under J. Edgar Hoover, conducted extensive surveillance on Martin Luther King Jr., motivated by suspicion of communist ties and other attempts to undermine his influence. During this surveillance, the FBI collected information that suggested King had multiple extramarital affairs. These findings were documented in wiretaps, informant reports, and confidential memos.

Details of FBI Reports

FBI intelligence files reportedly contained allegations of King engaging with multiple women during the height of his civil rights work. The agency sought to discredit him by compiling evidence of moral misconduct, including allegations of adultery. These documents have since been partially declassified, revealing claims that King's personal behavior did not align with the public moral image he projected.

Criticism of FBI Tactics

Many historians and civil rights advocates criticize the FBI's surveillance as invasive, politically motivated, and ethically questionable. The agency's efforts to expose King's private life were part of a broader campaign to destabilize the civil rights movement. Therefore, the reliability and intent behind the allegations have been scrutinized, with some arguing that the FBI exaggerated or manipulated information to damage King's reputation.
