While regional networks cover most games, select spring training games may be televised nationally on channels like MLB Network or ESPN. These broadcasts often highlight marquee matchups or special events during spring training, providing broader access to the games for fans outside the Houston area.

Cable and Satellite Providers

Cable and satellite television packages that include RSNs or national sports channels provide straightforward access to Astros spring training broadcasts. Subscribers should verify their provider's channel lineup to confirm availability and avoid missing any games.

Streaming Services and Online Platforms

Using VPN Services

Some viewers use virtual private network (VPN) services to bypass geographic restrictions by masking their IP address. However, this practice may violate terms of service agreements and is not officially recommended.

Confirming Subscription Packages

Ensuring the selected cable, satellite, or streaming service package includes the necessary channels is critical. Fans should review channel lineups and service features before subscribing to avoid missing Astros spring training broadcasts.
