The philosophy was popularized by Margareta Magnusson in her book on döstädning, where she outlines strategies for reducing clutter while alive to ease the burden on survivors. The practice involves systematically sorting through possessions, deciding what to keep, donate, or discard, and organizing belongings in a way that communicates care and thoughtfulness. It encourages individuals to confront mortality with pragmatism and grace, fostering a sense of control and peace.

Cultural Context

In Sweden, the concept of death cleaning aligns with broader societal values such as minimalism, sustainability, and consideration for community. The practice is not solely about physical tidying but also about emotional preparation and legacy management.
